PARENTING AND FAMILY SOCIALIZATION WITHIN A CULTURAL CONTEXT

ABSTRACT

Socialization is an ongoing process of social interaction through which children become functional members of a society. What it means to be a functional member in a given society, however, depends on the broader socio-cultural context. Goals of socialization and parenting practices used to accomplish these goals vary across cultural groups, and parents and other caregivers play a particularly influential role in the socialization process. Much of the psychological research concerning parents' contribution to their children's functioning is conducted with White middle-class families in United States and other Western societies, and little is known about parenting and socialization approaches in non-Western regions where a majority of the World's population resides. This chapter begins with a discussion of the relevance of cultural context in understanding parenting and socialization, and outlines a theoretical model to conceptualize the influence of culture on parenting and socialization. The chapter describes parental socialization approaches in two major non-Western countries, India and China (and immigrants from these countries elsewhere), and outlines directions for future research in the field of parental socialization across cultures.

PARENTING AND FAMILY SOCIALIZATION WITHIN A CULTURAL CONTEXT

Culture is a powerful influence in our lives, affecting how we view the world (Cox, Lobel, and McLeod, 1991) and how we raise our children (e.g., Julian, McKenry, and McKelvey, 1994; Triandis, 1989). Psychological research on parenting has generally focused on the experiences of middle class White families in United States (US) and other Western countries (i. e., UK), and culturally diverse parenting and family socialization practices have been compared unfavorably to this perceived norm (Hulei, Zevenbergen, and Jacobs, 2006;
